

It takes a friend to remember

Thomas C. Fox | Mar. 31, 2010 NCR Today

I think of Dorothy Day and the Catholic Worker Movement that began during the depths of the Great Depression, and which continues today to give care and comfort to the forsaken. I think of Thomas Merton and his outspoken protest of the Vietnam War. I think of the Catholic bishops who stood side by side with César Chávez in his fight for justice among the farm workers of California's Central Valley. I think of Archbishop Óscar Romero and the struggles of San Salvador. And I think of blighted neighborhoods across America where all-but-ignored nuns, priests, and committed laypeople offer hope to the nearly hopeless through soup kitchens, schools, and community centers. For them, and for energetic Catholic women I work with and teach -- so unjustly banned from a priesthood that sorely needs them -- the importance of justice-making always exceeds the importance of collars and confessions.

Tragedies come and go; issues like labor and immigration burn bright in the public consciousness for a time and then are forgotten. Long after the rest of the world has moved on, however, often enough the Catholic Church alone continues to affirm economic justice, offer a moral critique of capitalism, and, most importantly, insist that a radical love of the powerless and marginalized is the truest form of faith.

All this makes these latest reports of priests molesting children -- and getting away with it -- that much more upsetting.

The above are thoughts, [1] helpful at this time for all of us, of Rev. Dr. Serene Jones, a protestant and president of a seminary.

Source URL (retrieved on 02/28/2015 - 08:19): <http://ncronline.org/blogs/ncr-today/it-takes-friend-remember>

Links:

[1] http://www.huffingtonpost.com/serene-jones/not-throwing-stones-a-pro_b_519126.html