

John Jay never assessed 'arrogant clericalism'

Thomas P. Doyle | May. 21, 2011 Examining the Crisis

In the last few days I have carefully read the entire 143-page John Jay report on the causes of clergy sex abuse in the United States and have again reviewed the executive summaries and conclusions of 17 of the 27 reports on clergy sexual abuse that have been published between 1989 and 2011.

Most of these are from official sources such as the U.S. grand juries, the three Irish reports (Ferns, Ryan, Murphy) or the two Canadian reports that resulted from the Mt. Cashel debacle of the eighties. Others are from Church sources such as the National Review Board Report of 2004, The Bernardin Report of 1992 or Church sponsored reports such as the Defenbaugh Report (Chicago, 2006) or the first John Jay Report from 2004. Most of the reports contained a section on causality.

None of the reports said anything about the effect of the culture of the sixties or seventies as a factor of causality but every one of them pointed to the various kinds and levels of failure by the bishops as the essential cause of the phenomenon of sexual abuse of children and minors by clerics.

Read the full commentary: 'Arrogant clericalism' never assessed in John Jay report [1]

Source URL (retrieved on 01/30/2015 - 18:54): <http://ncronline.org/blogs/examining-crisis/john-jay-never-assessed-arrogant-clericalism>

Links:

[1] <http://ncronline.org/node/24792>