

Cardinal George leaves Pflieger at St. Sabina

Fr. Michael Pflieger told his parishioners at Mass on Sunday that he will remain as pastor of Chicago's St. Sabina Church, apparently indefinitely. As of July 1, he said he will become co-pastor, along with Fr. Tulani Magwaza, who has been an associate at St. Sabina for more than two years.

Details of the arrangement were reportedly worked out during a meeting between Pflieger and Cardinal Francis George at the cardinal's residence Jan. 23. In addition, Pflieger announced he will become, at George's request, the official diocesan spokesperson on gun violence, and has agreed to serve as administrator at another South Side parish, St. Margaret of Scotland, whose pastor, Fr. Daniel Mallette, was severely beaten during a break-in at the rectory in December.

Massgoers at St. Sabina clapped, cheered and hugged one another at the news, which undoubtedly came as a surprise to many. Just last April, Pflieger was suspended by the cardinal for two weeks after he threatened to leave the church rather than accept George's appointment of him as president of a nearby Catholic high school. But he was reinstated by the cardinal in May with the understanding that he would provide George with a "transition plan" for the future leadership of the parish by Dec. 1. Pflieger complied, though specifics of his plan were not made public.

George has frequently chided Pflieger for his freewheeling style and outspoken criticism of archdiocesan policies. He has on several occasions attempted to move Pflieger out of St. Sabina, where he has lived for 37 years and served as pastor for 31 years, a phenomenal feat of pastoral longevity by Catholic standards almost anywhere. His performance has made him perhaps the best-known cleric in Chicago and surely one of the best loved as well as most controversial.

Under his direction, St. Sabina was transformed into the largest and most active black Catholic parish in Chicago, perhaps in the country. Through his leadership, the neighborhood around the church complex, once the violence-ridden haven of gangs, drug dealers and prostitutes, now boasts two senior citizen high-rises, employment and health centers and a revival of retail businesses. Pflieger's no-nonsense assault on drugs, alcohol and especially gun violence continues unabated. At the same time, his frequent appearances in the media have earned him the enmity of those who consider him a publicity seeker, a maverick cleric and a determined rule-breaker.

Pflieger's co-pastor as of July, Magwaza, came to St. Sabina from his native South Africa at Pflieger's request and with George's approval in 2009. He is active in the parish and well-liked by parishioners. But considerable doubt remains among the people in the pews as to whether he -- or anyone else in the world -- could ever replace Pastor Pflieger.
