

Denying worries over security, Vatican cancels popemobile ride

The cancellation of a scheduled popemobile ride through a working-class neighborhood suggests that, despite official assurances, Pope Francis' chaotic entrance into the city Monday may have raised concerns among those responsible for his safety during his first international trip as pope.

Jesuit Fr. Federico Lombardi, the Vatican spokesman, told reporters Tuesday that the pope would not be taking a ride in his open popemobile planned for Wednesday in the northern Rio neighborhood of Tijuca. Instead, the spokesman said, the pope's ride to his visit to the Hospital of St. Francis of Assisi would be in a closed vehicle.

Lombardi said the decision did not reflect security concerns but was merely an effort to avoid the "confusion" of Monday, when Pope Francis used three means of transportation -- closed car, open popemobile and helicopter -- to travel from Rio's international airport to a meeting with government officials.

The spokesman noted that most of the popemobile rides scheduled for the remainder of the week were still expected to take place. The pope did take one such ride early Wednesday on the grounds of the Basilica of the National Shrine of Our Lady of Aparecida.

Lombardi said Vatican and Brazilian officials met Tuesday to discuss logistics for the remainder of the papal visit. He said the meeting did not reflect any heightened safety concerns in the wake of the pope's ride into Rio on Monday, when his Fiat Idea compact van was repeatedly stopped by surging crowds and rush-hour traffic.

The main agenda items of the meeting Tuesday, according to the spokesman, were choosing the pope's means of transportation to Aparecida the following day, and the venue of a papal meeting with Argentine pilgrims. It was decided that the pope would travel most of the 150-mile distance from Rio to the Marian shrine by plane, not helicopter as originally planned, because of expected rain and wind. The Thursday meeting with Argentines was scheduled to take place in Rio's cathedral.

Lombardi told reporters that the number of security officers assigned to walk alongside the popemobile had not been increased in the aftermath of the arrival events. Asked if officials had replaced the driver who had taken pope's car out of a specially cleared lane and into ordinary traffic Monday, Lombardi did not reply directly, saying only that a Brazilian driver would be preferable to a Vatican employee behind the wheel for the pope's stay in Rio.

The Vatican has sought to downplay any concerns about the pope's security during his visit here, which ends Sunday. Meeting with reporters a few hours after Pope Francis' arrival in the city, Lombardi said the pope had not been alarmed by the crowds that engulfed his car, but had appreciated their enthusiasm.

"The pope wants direct contact with the people," Lombardi said, "not a militarization of the situation."

Brazilian authorities planned to deploy more than 28,000 police officers for the week of events connected to the papal visit and World Youth Day.

Lombardi also dismissed the discovery of a homemade bomb in a public toilet Sunday at Aparecida, three days before the pope's visit there, saying the device would never have posed any serious danger to the pope or pilgrims.

Experts quoted in the Brazilian media have warned that Pope Francis was exposed to unnecessary risks during his first hours in Rio.

On his ride through downtown in the open popemobile, the pope "was in a vulnerable position and could have been the victim of an attack from a very short distance, but also could have been injured by a reckless member of the faithful trying to touch him," a reserve officer of Brazil's military police told the Rio daily O Globo.

Pope Francis' visit followed weeks of sometimes violent anti-government protests in Brazilian cities. On Monday evening, some 1,500 demonstrators clashed with police outside Rio's Guanabara Palace, where the pope was meeting with Brazil's President Dilma Rousseff and other dignitaries. Lombardi said Brazilian officials made the decision to transport the pope by helicopter from downtown to the palace to avoid the demonstrators.

But Brazilian Cardinal Joao Braz de Aviz, a Vatican official who accompanied the pope on his visit to Rio, said that the protests were not a cause for concern.

"I see no problem of insecurity," the cardinal told O Globo. "I see it rather as a positive phenomenon."
