

Descendants of the victims of the 1864 Sand Creek Massacre attend a ceremony in their honor during the United Methodist Church General Conference 2016 on May 18, 2016, in Portland. (RNS/Emily McFarlan Miller)

Emily McFarlan Miller

Contributor

View Author Profile

Religion News Service

View Author Profile

Join the Conversation

Send your thoughts to Letters to the Editor. Learn more

Woodstock, Ill. — August 25, 2018

Share on BlueskyShare on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

"You cannot understand our history as a country until you understand the history of the church."

That's how Mark Charles — a Navajo pastor, speaker and author — began his presentation to a room full of missionaries in the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, gathered this summer for their annual meeting.

He was laying out the origins of the Doctrine of Discovery, the idea first expressed in a series of 15th-century papal edicts and, later, royal charters and court rulings, that justifies the discovery and domination by European Christians of lands already inhabited by indigenous peoples.

In recent years, a number of mainline Protestant Christian denominations have passed resolutions repudiating the Doctrine of Discovery. Now they're considering how to act on those denunciations.

Some are creating educational resources on racism dealing with the doctrine and related themes. Others are calling for "full disclosure" on their denomination's involvement in land grabs and massacres of Native Americans. Some have even suggested returning church land to the indigenous people who originally lived there.

Like the push to come to terms with racism, the toppling of Confederate monuments and the rise of Christian nationalism, these efforts represent ways the mainline is wrestling with the nation's original sins.

"I'm encouraged that more and more Christian people seem on board to at least raise awareness," said Steven T. Newcomb, the Shawnee/Lenape author of "Pagans in the Promised Land: Decoding the Doctrine of Christian Discovery" and co-founder and co-director of the Indigenous Law Institute.

"I think we're exploring this together in terms of where it can go and the kinds of healing activities that can take place, and the reset of an honor and a respect for the original nations and peoples."

Steven T. Newcomb (Screenshot from video)

Doctrine of Discovery

The way Newcomb describes the Doctrine of Discovery these days is "a claim of a right of Christian domination."

It was first expressed by Pope Nicholas V in the 1452 papal bull "Dum Diversas," which — along with subsequent bulls "Romanus Pontifex" and "Inter Caetera" — created a theological justification for Christian rulers seizing the property and possessions of non-Christians.

That doctrine became enshrined in a number of other documents, including the "Requerimiento" read to indigenous peoples in what is now the United States, explaining their land had been donated to Spain and demanding they accept the authority of the pope and of the king and queen.

Protestants didn't immediately embrace the doctrine, according to Charles. But he hears its echoes in Puritan John Winthrop's famous "city on a hill" speech. Newcomb recognized it in the 1823 Supreme Court decision Johnson v. M'Intosh, which established that the U.S. government, not Native American nations, determined ownership of property.

It was referenced as recently as 2005 in the Supreme Court ruling Sherrill v. Oneida, in which justices held that the repurchase of traditional tribal lands did not restore tribal sovereignty to that land.

The doctrine, said Newcomb, led to policies like those that took Native American children from their homes to attend boarding schools operated under the motto "kill the Indian, save the man," causing intergenerational trauma still felt today.

Newcomb has written about presenting Pope Francis with a copy of his book in St. Peter's Square and meeting with a Vatican official at the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace, part of two decades of efforts to get the pope to formally renounce those 15th-century edicts.

Led by the Episcopal Church, Protestant groups slowly have begun to wrestle with the doctrine and are awakening to the need to address its ugly legacy.

Advertisement

Denouncing the doctrine

John Dieffenbacher-Krall, now chair of the Episcopal Diocese of Maine's Committee on Indian Relations, can't remember when he first heard about the Doctrine of Discovery. He's worked for public policy and advocacy groups most of his adult life and volunteered with the Maine Coalition for Tribal Sovereignty since 2002.

But it's still shocking to him.

On the Sunday after Columbus Day 2006, he asked the rector of his church, St. James' Episcopal Church in Old Town, Maine, for permission to preach about it, calling on the church, the diocese, the denomination and the entire Anglican Communion to renounce the doctrine.

"As we reconcile ourselves with the indigenous people of the Western Hemisphere, we also do our part in helping to reconcile this broken world with God," Dieffenbacher-Krall preached that day.

The next year, the Episcopal Diocese of Maine's convention passed a resolution repudiating the Doctrine of Discovery, and the Episcopal Church adopted a similar resolution denominationwide at its 2009 General Convention.

Copia de la bula del decreto y concession q̄ hizo el papa

Alexandro sexto al Rey ya la Reyna nuestros señores de las Indias conforme al capitulo, per venerabilem, s. rationibus, qui filij sint legitimi, y al cap. lxxviii. q. iiii.

In nomine dñi. Amen. Houverint vniuersi hoc presens publicum trasumptū in specturi q̄ nos Jaco b^o cobillos si e apostolice sedis graepu: Cathaenasto: habuim^o, vidim^o, et diligēter insperim^o infra scriptas literas felicis recoardationis Alexandri pape sexti eius vera bulla plūbea cū cordatis sericis, croccis coloris more Romane curie impēden tio bullato sanas siquidē et integras ac oimoda suspitione carentes huiusmodi sub tenore. ALEXANDER eps seruus seruorum dei carissimo in xpo filio Ferdinando Regis carissime in xpo filie Elisabethe Regine Castellae Legionis, Aragonis, Sici lie et Granate illustrib^o salutē et apostolicā benedictionē. Inter cetera diuine maiestati beneplacita opera et cordis nri considera bilia illud pfecto potissimū eritū vt fides catholica et xpiana religio nris pferim^o tēporib^o exaltetur ac vbi libet amplexur et dilataur animarū qz salus pcuratur ac barbāre natiōes depunantur et ad fidē ipsam redueantur. Unde cū ad hāc sacra pē tri sedē diuina fauente clemētia (meritis licet imparibus) euocati fuerim^o cognoscentes vos tanq̄ veros catholicos Reges et principes q̄les semp fuisse nouimus et a vobis pcedere gesta toti penē iā orbi nouissima dmostrāt: medū id exoptare sed omni conatu, studio et diligētia: nullis laboribus, nullis impēsse, nullisqz pēdo periculis etiā ppriū sanguinē effundēdo efficere ac omnē animū vestrū omnesqz conat^o ad hoc iam dudū dedicaste que admodū recuperatio regni Granate a trāside Saracēnorū bodieris tēpori b^o per vos cū tanta diuina gloria facta testatur. Digne ducimur nō immerito et debem^o illa vobis etiā sponte et fauorabili ter cōcedere per que huiusmodi sanctū et laudabile ac immortalī deo acceptū propositū in dies feruentiori animo ad ipsius dei honorem et imperij xpiani propagationē pro sequi valeatis. Sane accepimus qd̄ vos qui dudū animū propositū atis aliquas insulas et terras firmas remotas et incognitas ac per alios hactenus nō repta querere et inuēre vt illarū incolae et habitatores ad colēdū redēptorē nrm et fidē catholicā phtendū reducere: hacten^o in expugnationē et recupationē ipsi regni Granate plurimū occupati huiusmodi factū et laudabile, ppositū vrum ad optatū finē pducere nequimū sed tandē sicut dño placuit regno predicto recuperato, volētes desiderū adimplere vestrū dilectū filiū Christophorū colon virū vtiqz dignū et plurimū cōmendandū ac tanto negotio aptū cū nauigis et hominibus ad similia instructis nō sine marinis laborib^o et periculis ac expēsis ssumastis vt terras firmas et insulas remotas et incognitas huiusmodi per mare vbi hactenus nauigati nō fuerat diligēter inquireret. Qui tandē (diuino auxilio facta et maxima diligētia in mari oceano nauigante certas insulas remotissimas et etiā terras firmas que per alios hactenus reperte non fuerant) inuenerunt in quib^o q̄ plu rimē genies pacifice viuētes et vt asseritur nudū incedentes nec caribus vescentes inhabitant, et vt presati xpianij vestrū possunt opinari gētes ipse in insulis et terris predictis habitantes credunt vniū deum creatōrē in cuius esse ac ad fidē catholicā implerandū et bonis moribus imbuedū satis apri videntur spēs qz habetur quod si eruditur nomē saluatoris dñi nri Iesu xpi in terris et insulis predictis facile inducerentur. Ac presatio Chri stophorus in vna et principalibus insulis predictis iam vna turrim satis inuitam in qua certos christianos qui secum inuērit in custodia et vt alio in sulas ac terras firmas remotas et incognitas inquirent possunt construi et edificare fecit. In quibus quidē insulas et terris iam repertis aurū aromas ta et alie q̄ plurime res piose diuersi generis et diuersē q̄tatis reperiuntur. Unde oibus diligēter et pferim^o fidei catholice exaltatione et dilatatio ne (prout scēt catholicos Reges et principes) cōsiderano: more progenitorū vestrōrū clarē memorie regū: terras firmas et insulas p̄dictas illarū qz incolae et habitatores vobis diuina fauente clemētia subijcere et ad fidē catholicā reducere propositus. Nos igitur huiusmodi vestrū sanctum et laudabile propositū plurimū in dño cōmendantes ac cupientes vt illud ad debitū finē perducatur et ipsum nomē saluatoris nri Iesu xpi in ducatur: hortamur vos q̄ plurimū in dño et per sacri lauari iniectionē qua mādatū apostolicū obligat estis et viscera misericordie dñi nri Iesu xpi antē requirimus vt cū expeditionē huiusmodi cōmunicetis et assumere pronamente out bōdore fidei zelo inuēntos populos in huiusmodi insulis et terris degentes ad christianā religionē suscipiendū inducere velitis et debeatis nec periculose labores vilo vnqz tēpore vos deterreat fir ma spe fiducia qz cōceptio qd̄ deus omnipotēs conatus vros feliciter prosequetur. Et vt itā negocij p̄uincia apostolice gratie largitate donati libe rino et audacis assumatis. Ad om̄i proptio nō ad vestrā vel alterius pio vobis super hoc nobis oblate petitionis instāā sed de nostra mera liberalita te et certa scientia ac de apostolice potestatis plenitudine omnes insulas et terras firmas inuentas et inuēntas et inuēntas et detegendas versus occi dentē et meridiē fabricādo et construendo vna lincā a polo arctico salicet septentrione ad poliū antarcticū scilicet meridiē sine terre firme et insule inuēntē et

Pope Alexander VI's papal bull "Inter Caetera" from 1493. This papal bull gave Spanish explorers the freedom to colonize the Americas and to convert Native peoples to Catholicism. (Image courtesy of Library of Congress)

Read this next: Disastrous doctrine had papal roots

A number of mainline Protestant denominations since have approved similar repudiations, including the United Methodist Church, the Unitarian Universalist Association, the United Church of Christ, the Community of Christ, Presbyterian Church (USA), the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America and a number of Religious Society of Friends (Quaker) meetings.

The executive committee of the World Council of Churches — which includes 350 churches, denominations and fellowships around the world — also issued a statement repudiating the doctrine and calling on member churches to learn about the history and issues facing indigenous peoples in their areas.

"It's not that denominations have thought of it, it's that they've been called on by indigenous peoples to live out their faith," said June L. Lorenzo, who is Laguna Pueblo/Dine and a ruling elder at Laguna United Presbyterian Church, part of the PCUSA.

Lorenzo, was part of the team that wrote a report to the PCUSA following up on its repudiation, detailing how the Presbyterian church played a role in creating and implementing government policies affecting Native Americans; how, because those policies largely were linked to land, the church's work among Native Americans was, too; and how some Presbyterians throughout history have supported Native Americans' sovereignty and can model this for the church today.

That report and another resolution expanding the PCUSA's response to the doctrine both passed this summer. Among the actions they suggest: Each General Assembly meeting should begin with an acknowledgment of the indigenous people on whose land it takes place; the church also will encourage its seminaries to "give voice" to Native American theologies and direct the Presbyterian Mission Agency to create educational resources on racism dealing with the doctrine and related themes.

Read this next: Intergenerational grief on Cheyenne River Indian Reservation

What's next?

After a two-hour presentation tracing the impact of the Doctrine of Discovery through U.S. history, Charles asked this summer's gathering of ELCA missionaries how they felt.

"Convicted," said one. "Enraged," "deceived," "ashamed" and "complicit," chimed in the others.

"It's important to acknowledge how this history makes us feel," said Charles, who is writing a book about the Doctrine of Discovery with North Park University professor Soong-Chan Rah.

"There's a reason we don't talk about these things. There's a reason we have a mythology and not a history book. We literally don't know what to do with this. It drives us crazy."

A gathering of about 100 religious and indigenous people hosted by the Skä·noñh—Great Law of Peace Center, recently asked that question in Liverpool, N.Y.

"Obviously, a lot of this is merely symbolic," said Philip P. Arnold, founding director of the center and associate professor and chair of the religion department at Syracuse University.

But, Arnold added: "What would it look like for each of the Christians who attended the New York gathering to return to their home churches and work alongside the indigenous people in their communities?"

Mark Charles — a Navajo pastor, speaker and author — discusses the Doctrine of Discovery with a room of missionaries in the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, gathered July 26 for their annual meeting at the Loyola University Retreat and Ecology Campus in Woodstock, Illinois. (RNS/Emily McFarlan Miller)

More than words

Newcomb said he hasn't heard many churches seriously discuss returning land to the indigenous peoples to whom it once belonged. But he does remember times non-Native Christians have asked him what they could do to be "allies" to Native Americans.

He told them to go home and have their churches draw up documents acknowledging they are on the territory of the nation originally from that place.

For one Pacific Northwestern church, he remembered, that proved to be a challenge. Members of the congregation had to deal with their fears about what would happen, what it would mean if they acknowledged they were on someone else's land.

"There was a lot of discussion and dialogue that occurred," he said. "People had to come to terms with their own psychology and their fears."

Alongside its repudiation in 2012, the United Methodist Church called for a study providing "full disclosure" of the involvement of prominent Methodists and the denomination as an institution in the 1864 Sand Creek Massacre.

At their next denominational meeting in 2016, United Methodists held a ceremony honoring the descendants of the victims of that massacre. The denomination also released a 173-page report detailing how U.S. troops led by Col. John Milton Chivington, a pastor in the Methodist Episcopal Church, killed 230 Arapaho and Cheyenne people who were peacefully camped along Sand Creek in what was then the Colorado Territory.

This summer, St. John United Methodist Church in Bridgeton, N.J., incorporated elements of Nanticoke Lenni-Lenape and other Native American cultures into its vacation Bible school curriculum, and the denomination's Oregon-Idaho Conference returned 1.5 acres in Oregon to the Nez Perce nation.

The ELCA's first test after its denunciation in 2016 came about a month later: There were clashes within the denomination over action to stop the Dakota Access pipeline on the Standing Rock Sioux Reservation in North Dakota. Presiding Bishop Elizabeth Eaton later released a statement supporting the Standing Rock Sioux Tribe after visiting the camps where hundreds of Native Americans and supporters had gathered on the reservation.

Now — as the denomination builds its Native American Ministry Fund and plans to observe its repudiation at next year's Churchwide Assembly — Prairie Rose Seminole, a member of the Three Affiliated Tribes of North Dakota and program director for the ELCA's American Indian Alaska Native Ministries, said she is seeing hope.

"I'm seeing people willing to put themselves in a space where they're going to learn other narratives about who we are as a church, and that's really promising to me because I feel that's who we are as Lutherans," Seminole said. "You are living your faith in action when you are questioning the truth around you and finding out what's missing."