After reviewing more than 2,400 clergy files dating back nearly 70 years, the Archdiocese of New Orleans released the names of 55 priests and two deacons who had been removed from ministry for accusations of sexual abuse of a minor.

"This day is about the healing of victims," Archbishop Gregory Aymond said in releasing the names Nov. 2.

Admitting he wrestled with the voluntary decision to release the names because he feared the list might not be accurate or complete, Aymond said it was the right thing to do as a step toward healing the pain of victims, those who are known and those whom he urged to come forward if they have not already done so.

"I believe it is the right thing to do in order to foster the healing of victims, in a spirit of transparency and in the pursuit of justice," Aymond said in a statement to the people of the archdiocese.

Quoting Jesus' words in John 8:32 -- "The truth will set you free" -- Aymond asked forgiveness of victims.

"For our sins of the past, we ask for your forgiveness and the mercy of God," he said. "Our sin is public, and it calls us as church leaders to repentance in order that our church can experience renewal."

Aymond said a team of more than 10 women and men, including staff members and outside legal professionals, examined the personnel files of 2,432 priests who have served in the archdiocese since 1950.

If a priest was accused after his death of sexually abusing a minor, making a defense of that claim extremely difficult, "additional people reviewed the file to ensure accuracy to the extent that is possible after death," the archbishop said.

The names of the 57 priests and deacons removed from ministry of sexual abuse were given to the Orleans Parish District Attorney's Office. This "parish" is a civil jurisdiction.

The archdiocese has agreed to allow authorities in other civil parishes to examine the personnel files upon request.

The archbishop said the safeguards instituted in 2002 by the U.S. bishops' "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People" have helped the church "significantly" reduce the incidence of sexual abuse.

He said most of the accusations made public by the archdiocese Nov. 2 "are from incidents that occurred decades ago, even as long as 70 years ago. There has not been a substantiated allegation of sexual abuse of a minor committed in well over a decade by a member of the clergy in ministry in the Archdiocese of New Orleans."

"As we know, one case of sexual abuse is one too many," Aymond said.

Citing the 2017 annual report on the implementation of the charter, the archbishop said in the United States over the last two years, there have been eight substantiated claims of sexual abuse against priests, which represents .025 percent of the country's 33,917 priests.

"While just one case of sexual abuse is one too many, these statistics give evidence that our safe environment program of background checks for those who work with minors, trainings for both adults and children and extensive psychological testing and formation for seminarians have had a very positive impact on protecting our children."

Of the 55 priests named, 27 were diocesan priests of the Archdiocese of New Orleans and three were priests from other dioceses who served in New Orleans; and the remaining 25 priests belonged to religious orders who served in New Orleans.

The two deacons named were ordained for the archdiocese.

Aymond said the team that reviewed the archdiocesan files had done its "very best to make this report as accurate and complete as possible," and he urged anyone who has questions about why a name was not on the list to come forward by contacting the archdiocesan victims assistance coordinator, Marist Br. Stephen Synan.

"As a church, our rock foundation is Jesus Christ," the archbishop said. "It is his church and has been for over 2,000 years. In spite of our sins, he will not desert the church but will lead us toward healing and renewal."
