

Cardinal Timothy Dolan, pictured in a June 7, 2018, file photo, announced Feb. 4 the closing of seven schools within the Archdiocese of New York. (CNS/Gregory Shemitz)

Jacob Comello

View Author Profile

Catholic News Service

View Author Profile

Join the Conversation

Send your thoughts to Letters to the Editor. Learn more

Washington — February 8, 2019

Share on BlueskyShare on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

In the First Letter of Peter, we read: "Beloved, do not be surprised that a trial by fire is occurring among you, as if something strange were happening to you. But rejoice to the extent that you share in the sufferings of Christ, so that when his glory is revealed you may also rejoice exultantly."

Cardinal Timothy Dolan of New York invoked this theme in a Twitter video he posted late Feb. 4 about school closures.

"Today we made the painful announcement that seven of our beloved Catholic schools in the Archdiocese of New York are not going to reopen next fall. ... These are painful and difficult decisions and I ask for your prayers for those especially impacted," in text accompanying the video.

Catholic New York, the archdiocesan newspaper, reported the closings were first announced by the Office of the Superintendent of Schools of the Archdiocese of New York. Two schools each in the boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx, and one each in the borough of Staten Island, Dutchess County and Sullivan County will be shuttered at the end of the 2018-19 academic year.

"You know, I'd rather be opening some new ones instead of closing the gems that we've got, but reality sets in," Dolan said in his video.

But he noted a silver lining in the situation. In particular, he mentioned that all "the kids in the schools that are closing are going to be able to go to another Catholic school nearby, all but one." Those kids would be welcomed "immediately (and) enthusiastically" to their new learning environments, he said.

Overall, Dolan stated, the archdiocese will have "a few less Catholic schools, but the ones we got are more vibrant and sturdy than ever."

Of course, he continued, "that doesn't erase the pain of our parents, and our beloved teachers, our principals, and especially our students."

In a news release, the archdiocese cited financial and operational issues, as well as problems with school buildings as reasons for decision.

Joseph Zwilling, director of communications, also told Catholic News Service that underlying these factors, "all (closings) were enrollment driven."

Dolan addressed the subject of declining enrollment in his video, stating that the closures could have been avoided "if we had 10 percent more kids in each of those schools." He then encouraged all Catholics in the archdiocese to consider sending their children to Catholic schools if they don't already.

At the end of his video, Dolan emphasized one more factor he said hurts the growth of archdiocesan schools: "The injustice, the injustice continues that we don't get a dime from the government to support our wonderful schools."

Zwilling told CNS that the cardinal was referring to "the fact that in New York, any efforts to have the government provide for Catholic or other religious schools have all failed in (the) state Legislature." Among these efforts was a push to institute a tax credit that would have lifted a portion of the tuition burden off the shoulders of low- to middle-income parents who chose private schools for their children.

Cardinal Dolan
@CardinalDolan

Follow

Today we made the painful announcement that seven of our beloved Catholic schools in the Archdiocese of New York are not going to reopen next fall. I know these are painful and difficult decisions and I ask for your prayers for those especially impacted.

2:54 PM - 4 Feb 2019

Cardinal Timothy Dolan of New York is pictured in a video screen grab off his Twitter feed Feb. 4, 2019, announcing the closing of seven schools within the Archdiocese of New York. (CNS/Twitter)

Called the Education Investment Tax Credit when it was proposed in 2016, the bill would have given half of the money it reserved for credits to those who had donated money to private school scholarship programs.

James Cultrara, director of education at the New York State Catholic Conference, told CNS in an email that despite having support from both parties in the New York Legislature and the blessing of Gov. Andrew Cuomo, "the measure was not adopted as lawmakers were considering a broad range of competing interests."

Had it been adopted, Cultrara thinks that "we would likely not be in the desperate position of having to close schools that parents want their children to attend."

Both Dolan and Zwillig emphasized that Catholic schools are still very cost effective, far more so than their government-run counterparts.

The cardinal said Catholic schools in New York educate children for "about half" of what area public schools spend in the area do.

Schools in the archdiocese "have always had to get by on a limited budget" amid lowering enrollment rates, according to Zwillig. But the resulting resourcefulness can be chalked up to "a great deal of dedication on part of the parents and excellent teachers we have," he added.

The archdiocese has more than 200 Catholic schools serving more than 62,000 students from pre-kindergarten through 12th grade.

Advertisement