

EarthBeat

Opinion

Vatican

A student holds a sign with a message that reads in Portuguese: "Save the Amazon," during a protest Sept. 7, 2019, in Rio de Janeiro against budget cuts on public education carried out by President Jair Bolsonaro's administration and in defense of the Amazon rainforest. Students wore black jerseys symbolizing the mourning for the Amazon and education. (AP/Silvia Izquierdo)

Thomas Reese

View Author Profile

Follow on Twitter at @thomasreeseSJ

Religion News Service

View Author Profile

Join the Conversation

Send your thoughts to Letters to the Editor. Learn more

Vatican City — October 23, 2019

Share on BlueskyShare on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

Saving the Amazon rainforest requires action by Western nations, a Surinamese bishop attending the Catholic Church's synod on the Amazon region said, charging that the people of the Amazon cannot do it by themselves.

"Even if we implement all the measures against deforestation or against the polluting of the rivers," explained Bishop Karel Martinus Choennie of Paramaribo, Suriname's capital, "it would still not have an effect if (people in) the Western world — Europe, America, Japan and China — don't change their lifestyles."

The bishop spoke at a Vatican news conference on Tuesday (Oct. 22) in Rome, where the synod of bishops has been meeting for two weeks. This final and third week, the bishops are considering a draft report with recommendations for the pope that will be put to vote on Saturday.

Choennie's comments reflect those of many bishops who have spoken during the meeting and blamed Western companies and consumers for the ecological devastation of the Amazon.

A major concern of the bishops is deforestation of the Amazon rainforest, said Choennie.

"We are heading on a path of self-destruction," he said. He notes that "there are scientists who predict that if we increase the deforestation by even 5%, it will have a disastrous and irreversible effect."

Many people in developed nations do not see themselves as responsible for the rainforest's destruction, nor do they see the urgency of the problem, the bishop complained. "When they realize it, they are not willing to give up their lifestyle."

"The good living in the Western concept is a luxurious living," Choennie said. "The forest is disappearing because Europe and China and the rest of the rich world want to eat meat." The reluctance to adopt a more sober lifestyle and the desire for cheaper meat "will result in greater deforestation," he explained.

The West "wants the Amazonian people to keep the forest," said Choennie, "but they don't want to change their lifestyles, and that is the big contradiction."

Other bishops have pointed to the West's appetite for gold, timber and agricultural products as causes of deforestation.

In addition, climate change threatens the rainforest.

"If global warming continues and if we don't reach the goals of the Paris agreement, the Amazon forest will disappear," explained the bishop.

Deforestation is caused by an economic system that prizes money over people and nature. Said Choennie: "This economy is unjust. It is unjust for the next generation. What kind of world are we going to leave for the next generation?"

"It is unjust," he continued, "because the riches only come to the West and the poverty is for us, because all the natural resources that leave our country don't make our country any better." He reports that "our education systems, our health systems, our social systems, all remain far behind."

"We need a new kind of economy, an economy of solidarity," said the bishop, "an integral ecology where they also consider nature and social life of others."

He recognizes that ecological conversion to a simpler lifestyle is not easy. "The church and everybody have the obligation for education that takes the ecological change really seriously," he said.

Politicians in the Amazon countries "look at the next election," he observed. "They want to have production, they want to have mining, they want to have economic growth, and they all seek economic growth in terms of finance, not an integral ecology."

"If we want the governments of the Pan-Amazonian countries to change their policies of mining and deforestation," he said, "we have to offer them a real solution" by maybe leasing the forest so they have a mutual interest, because climate change is affecting everybody."

He noted that there is a solidarity fund for the Amazon but only Norway and Germany have contributed to it. "The other rich countries don't want to add anything to the fund," he reported.

"There is a political stagnation," he asserted. "There is no creativity in politics and economics to change our way of life. I urge the Western governments and those in power to find real solutions."

Unless this happens, he believes the rainforest is doomed.

[Jesuit Fr. Thomas Reese is a columnist for Religion News Service and author of Inside the Vatican: The Politics and Organization of the Catholic Church.]

Editor's note: You can sign up to receive an email every time a new Signs of the Times column is posted. Sign up here.

Advertisement

This story appears in the Synod for the Amazon feature series. View the full series

.