

A file photo shows smoke billowing from a plant in Menznau, Switzerland. In a joint statement with Protestant leaders, Switzerland's Catholic Church backed legislation penalizing companies that damage the environment or abuse human rights. (CNS photo/Reuters/Michael Buholzer)

Jonathan Luxmoore

View Author Profile

Catholic News Service

View Author Profile

Join the Conversation

Send your thoughts to Letters to the Editor. Learn more

Oxford, England — October 16, 2020

Share on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

The Catholic Church in Switzerland has backed legislation that would penalize companies that damage the environment or abuse human rights.

"This initiative focuses on human rights violations, whose primary victims are the poorest and most vulnerable," the church said in a joint appeal with Protestant leaders. "It makes an urgent appeal, to both our government and the community of nations, to engage with determination and without compromise for the validation and respect of human rights worldwide."

The statement was published ahead of a Nov. 29 referendum on a corporate responsibility initiative requiring Swiss companies to uphold environmental and human rights standards, under threat of controls and sanctions.

The religious leaders said obligations under the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights provided a "protective shield" for people worldwide and applied to companies and multinationals under corporate responsibility rules set out by the 37-state Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development.

"Enterprises which base their business practices on a weak application of human rights, or on insufficient controls over their own violations, gain an economic advantage at the expense of fundamental rights," the church leaders said.

If passed in the referendum, the legislation would trigger constitutional amendments imposing due diligence requirements on Swiss companies and their affiliates operating at home and abroad.

The statement said human rights and environmental protection should gain special advocacy in traditionally neutral Switzerland, which acted as a base for international humanitarian organizations.

"Swiss multinationals carry a humanitarian tradition, based on the rule of law, with them around the world," the Catholic and Protestant churches said.

"No business should be able to profit or gain competitive advantage from the violation or circumvention of human rights."

Advertisement