Pope Francis says he was left "astonished" by the violent attack on the U.S. Capitol Jan. 6, expressing surprise in his first interview since the riot that such a scene could unfold in a country with a long history of practicing democracy.

"I was astonished because they are people so disciplined in democracy," the pontiff told Italian news channel TgCom24 as part of an interview that will air Jan. 10.

Francis suggests the riot, which led to the deaths of five people, shows "something isn't working ... [with] people taking a path against the community, against democracy, against the common good."

"Thanks be to God that this has burst out and there was a chance to see it well, because now you can try and heal it," the pope says, according to a clip of the interview posted to the channel's website Jan. 9.

In the clip, Francis tells his interviewer that all societies experience violence.

"No people can boast about never having a day with a case of violence," says the pontiff. "It happens throughout history. But we have to understand it well so that it does not repeat, learning from history."
