

President Joe Biden speaks at the White House in Washington Jan. 26, 2021. (CNS photo/Reuters/Kevin Lamarque)

by Catholic News Service

View Author Profile

Join the Conversation

Send your thoughts to Letters to the Editor. Learn more

Washington — February 4, 2021

Share on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

Presidential executive orders related to environmental protection and climate change have gained the support of Archbishop Paul S. Coakley of Oklahoma City, chairman of the U.S. bishops' Committee on Domestic Justice and Human Development.

President Joe Biden's actions "resonate deeply with an integral ecology that listens to the 'least of these,'" as expressed in Pope Francis' encyclical, "Laudato Si', on Care for Our Common Home," the archbishop said in a Feb. 3 statement released by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

He added that Biden's steps to restore regulations governing automobile emission standards, hazardous air pollutants and the integrity of the Environmental Policy Act, all of which the USCCB previously supported, "speak of a commitment to restoring public health and the common home."

While recognizing that Biden's orders recommit the nation to "robust and integrated climate mitigation policies," Coakley also urged the president to emphasize other steps.

Among them are environmental justice, climate adaptation and resilience, the need for clean air, clean water and the conservation of land, ecosystems and agriculture, and a just transition and revitalization of communities reliant on the energy industry.

Since becoming president Jan. 20, Biden has signed several orders addressing environmental concerns including reentering the U.S into the Paris climate agreement; pausing and reviewing oil and gas drilling on federal land; eliminating fossil fuel subsidies; building clean energy jobs; transitioning the government's large fleet of cars and truck to electric vehicles; and addressing pollution that disproportionately affects disadvantaged communities.

Advertisement