The Holy Spirit's gift of comfort and solace is meant to unite all men and women and not take sides with any ideology, Pope Francis said on Pentecost.

Celebrating Mass May 23 at the main altar in St. Peter's Basilica, the pope said those who listen to the Holy Spirit are not "concerned with conservatives and progressives, traditionalists and innovators, right and left."

If adherence to an ideology becomes "our criteria, then the church has forgotten the Spirit," he added.

The Holy Spirit "impels us to unity, to harmony, to the harmony of diversity. He makes us see ourselves as parts of the same body, brothers and sisters of one another," the pope said. "Let us look to the whole! The enemy wants diversity to become opposition and so he makes them become ideologies. Say no to ideologies, yes to the whole."

With pandemic restrictions slowly easing in Rome and across Italy, the Sunday Mass was celebrated in St. Peter's Basilica with an estimated 1,000 people, wearing masks and socially distanced.

Reflecting on the feast of Pentecost, the pope said the use of the word "Paraclete" is not only meant to describe the Holy Spirit as an "advocate" but also as a "comforter," especially in "times of difficulty like those we are presently experiencing due to the pandemic."

The comforts of the world, he explained, are like a pain reliever that offers only temporary relief but does not "cure the illness we carry deep within."

"Only someone who makes us feel loved for who we are can give peace to our hearts. The Holy Spirit, the love of God, does precisely that," the pope said. "He is the very love of God, who does not abandon us, for being present to those who are alone is itself a source of comfort."

In turn, Christians are called to "embody the comfort he brings" and to be near to others "not with trite words, but with prayer and closeness," he said.

The Holy Spirit, he added, is telling the church that today is a "time for comforting" and more joyfully proclaiming the Gospel rather than "combatting paganism" or "lamenting the drama of secularization."

"It is the time for pouring out love upon the world, yet not embracing worldliness," the pope said. "It is more the time for testifying to mercy, than for inculcating rules and regulations. It is the time of the Paraclete. It is the time of freedom of heart, in the Paraclete."

Continuing his homily, Francis said that while the spirit of the Evil One deceives all to "yield to the allure and promptings of vice," the Holy Spirit is "the spirit of truth" that brings "thoughts and feelings" without forcing or imposing.

The Holy Spirit affirms to Christians "the primacy of today," which means living "in the present" and not being "paralyzed by rancor or memories of the past" nor fearful of the future, the pope said.

In affirming the "primacy of the whole," he continued, the Holy Spirit does not "mold isolated individuals" but rather "shapes us into a church in the wide variety of our charisms, into a unity that is never uniformity."

The apostles, the pope explained, were people who had "contrary political ideas, different visions of the world" and who, upon receiving the Spirit, "learned to give primacy not to their human viewpoints but to the 'whole' that is God's plan."

Lastly, the Holy Spirit affirms "the primacy of grace" and calls on all Christians to "put God before yourself," the pope said.

If the church only concerns itself with "our own projects, our structures, our plans for reform" then it will "bear no fruit," Francis said.

"The church is human, but it is not merely a human organization, it is the temple of the Holy Spirit," he said. "Jesus brought the fire of the Spirit to the earth, and the church is reformed by the anointing of grace, the gratuity of the anointing of grace, the power of prayer, the joy of mission and the disarming beauty of poverty. Let us put God in first place!"
